

It is with great pleasure that we, after more than a year of hard work, can proudly present this year's edition of the Kent Student Law Review. This is the second year of the journal and we hope that it will continue to serve as a platform to demonstrate to the academic and legal community at large what it means to attend a critical law school.

The articles in this year's edition do not follow a particular theme, featuring authors dealing a variety of legal questions. We have this year, as with last year, maintained a wholehearted focus on selecting articles that meet the rigorous academic standards that have become the signum of the Kent Student Law Review.

In selecting these articles, we wished to add to the academic debates in each article's respective field and we believe that through them, we have highlighted the benefits a unique, diverse, and intellectually stimulating environment the University of Kent and Kent Law School provide. Kent prides itself on its critical law school reputation and for good reason; these carefully curated articles are of high quality and set us apart from the majority of legal institutions in this country.

We would like to thank Kent Law School for their continuing support. We would also like to thank Professor Rosemary Hunter, Professor Toni Williams, Dr. Sinéad Ring, and Dr. Nick Piska who served on the Academic Review Committee during the past year and have dedicated their time and expertise in helping us make this publication possible. Finally, we would like to extend our immense gratitude to our authors for their hard work, dedication, and infinite patience as we prepared for this issue. Without them, there would not be a Kent Student Law Review. Thank you so much.
